IMPACT

The translation team reported the following about one village:

“Elder Pinto’s village have always welcomed us with great joy... What they want most is for us to continue telling stories so that they and their children stay in God’s Word. Because today, in the world we live in, there have been many negative influences and young people no longer want to go to church, and telling stories from the Bible in the villages is of great value to them, so that all people can be reached.”

The Ovahumbi people live in rural villages near Camucuio town in Angola. Heavy seasonal rains can cause flooding that isolates the area. Daily life centres on caring for livestock, crops, and children. Of the three Camucuio language groups, the Ovahumbi are the most developed and have encountered the Gospel since at least 1995. Christianity is sometimes blended with traditional beliefs. Poverty and intergroup conflict have caused divisions, even within churches. Encouragingly, younger Christians are increasingly open to unity across ethnic lines, aided by oral Bible stories in heart languages.
